It is called the reporting clause. Highlight the words and punctuation that indicate speech in the passage below. Mr Smith asked if they knew anything about the incident in the playground. “Sorry sir, we didn’t see what happened,” insisted the children. The teacher was not convinced. “Well the window didn’t break all by itself,” he muttered. He told everyone to go back inside while they cleared up all the broken glass. The inverted commas show us the direct speech. The verb ‘told’ indicates that the teacher said ‘go back inside’ to the children. This is indirect speech.

Highlight the indirect speech in the passage below. Explain how you know.

They looked around at the bleak, snowy hillside and wondered how they were going to find their way back home. The staff at the hotel had suggested that they stay indoors today as the weather forecast was bad. Now they wished that they had listened to them.

The verb 'suggested' indicates that the words 'stay indoors today as the weather forecast was bad, were spoken.

This is indirect speech and it can be harder to spot than direct speech as there are no speech marks to help the reader. Today we will be mainly looking at direct speech and how the punctuation helps us to identify the speech.

Even though old Mr Smith had told them that they should never go near it, they were determined to find out what was making the terrible screeching sound. "Do you really think we should be doing this?" whispered Stefan as they reached the broken front door. "Probably not," replied Lily, "but something sounds like it's in pain and I'm going to help it!"

6. "Where have you been?" asked the man as I walked into the room. "Pick up that box and deliver it to the address written on the top." He obviously thought I was somebody else, but I wasn't going to correct him. I grabbed the box and hurried outside. Perhaps this address would be the one where Eric was being held prisoner. The police had told me not to interfere in their investigation, but I had to find my best friend. I sprinted to the new address. I heard a familiar voice coming from inside. "Eric!" I croaked.

"How are we going to win the trophy without you?" pleaded Julia. "You don't need me. Ask Evie, she's a great striker too," suggested Olivia. Julia was not keen on the idea as she thought Evie was a bit odd, but she discussed it with the team at lunchtime. They all agreed. They had no choice but to ask Evie to be their striker for the final.
6. The storm raged around their tiny raft, tossing it back and forth and side to side. The crew clung desperately to the sides of the boat and prayed that they would soon be rescued. They had made it very clear to the coastguard in their distress call that they were in grave danger. "Hold on tight, lads," the captain hollered, but his words were whipped away by the howling wind. One of the men sobbed and muttered a prayer for safety under his breath. Captain Smith knew their situation was perilous, but he had to keep the morale of his men up, so he staggered from one man to the next, telling them not to lose hope and that help would soon arrive.
